Abstract: The Original South African History Archive (SAHA) Collection includes papers and publications collected from various anti-apartheid movement organisations ranging from between 1980-1992. The major categories in this collection includes: government and administrative structures, homelands, rural community organisations and removals, political parties, military, police and state security, legal and judiciary, political organisations, women's organisations, youth organisations, right-wing organisations, urban, social, community housing organisations, labour, education, religion and churches, media, sport and culture, economy, health, foreign relations, environment, general service organisations and international relations.

Introduction

In the formative years before 1992, both SAHA and the People's History Trust were managed by activists without any formal archival training. These custodians applied techniques more often used in libraries for the collection, arrangement and description of archival materials collected or donated to the organisations. Textual materials were catalogued by subject with little attention paid to preserving documentation in accordance with the original context of the materials, what is often referred to as 'provenance' in archival discourse. After 1992, the principles of provenance began to inform the processing of SAHA material. The collections made accessible before this date could not always be rearranged into separate collections arranged by source or donor. As a result many remained, arranged by subject, in this collection. Due to the subject ordering of this collection, culled from a myriad of sources, for many years this collection was referred to as the "Database Collection".

Notes

This collection includes documents, newsletters and pamphlets collected from various anti-apartheid organisations. It covers a wide spectrum of political, community and trade union organisations which were active in South Africa in the 1980s.
